EATTLE OF SUNKER HILL.

The day is the anniversary of the battle of Bunker Hill, which will be commemorated by military parades in warkous parts of the Union, and particularly in New England. On the morning of the 17th of June, 1776, the British under General Hewe, marthet up the heights of Eunker or Breed's Hill, to dislodge the Americans there assembled under the command of Generals Prescott and Pulsam. This, the first important battle of the American Revolution, is one upen which historians love to dw M. It was a bright summer's day, and the hosts of England, marshalled for the attack, presented a brilliant sight, when on they came with gittering gass and martial ususic, to strike a death blow (as they thought) to the American Rebellion. It was then that "Old Put," as he was familiarly called, gave his celebrated order, "Boys, reserve your fire till you can see the white of their eyes." The solid columns of the English had arrived within gistol shot, in other words "the white of their eyes." could be seen, when the command "fire" covered the American breastwork withous solid shoet of figure, and seen death and destruction into the ranks of the assallants. Three different times was the assault repeated, and every time with the like result, when at last the Americans were obliged to retreat for want of sowder. In the retreat they were pursued by the British, and having no beyonets they were compelled to defend themselves with the buts of their makets, pitchforks, or anything else available they could lay their hands spon. It was during the retreat that the brave Warren fell, who was in the ranks at the time as a volumicer, sud among the last to retire from the American breastwork. In this evagagement the British lost in hilled and wounded 1,054 men, and the Americans 453. Not whatstanding the retreat of the rebels for want of ammunition, this has always been justly regarded as a great American victory, and is so commemorated by the granite monument that now stands upon the ground of which t
